

Ten Principles for Building Healthy Places

What does it take to build healthier places? This report distills lessons-learned from the three Advisory Services panels ULI conducted in Colorado during the spring of 2013, as well as insights from a summer 2013 workshop attended by experts from a variety of fields. If acted upon, the principles described in the report will:

- help people live longer, more productive lives;
- reduce unhealthy lifestyles;
- help improve a community's competitive advantages; and
- allow developers, investors, local governments and citizens to prosper in the 21st century.

Through the Building Healthy Places Initiative, the Urban Land Institute is working to promote healthy places across the globe.
